Daniel Webster used to tell, with keen relist, of his return to his old home in Saulsbury N. H. after his fame had become na tional. He found his way alone "If I only had capital" we to a farm next to that where he heard a young man say, as he had been born, and met a grumpuffed away at a ten cent cigar, py old neighbor, whom he well "I would do something."

"If I only had capital," said afield. Finding himself unrecoganother, as he walked away from bized. Mr. Webster had the a place where he had left ten fancy to see how much his old cents for a drink, "I would go friends had enjoyed his success. "A man named Webster used to live hereabouts?" he said interrogatively.

"Yes, Ebenezer Webster, He's dead."

"I believe the old gentleman had some sons?"

"Yes, he had sons."

Mr Webster waited a moment, but there was no mention of the "godlike Daniel."

"Ah! What became of the sons." He asked.

"Weil, Ezeklel, he's dead. He was as good looking a man as ever I saw, was Zeke."
